Soldiers compete in Freefall competition

The Fort Bragg U.S. Army Parachute Team hosted its 6th annual Black and Gold meet at Laurinburg-Maxton Airport Nov. 10 through 13.

Many of the competitors are active-duty Soldiers and active-duty National Guard or reservists who have more than 150 jumps. During the first day of the event many began their training jumps following the safety briefing. Safety was the biggest priority according to competition judge, Sgt. 1st Class Matt Davidson, USAPT.

"As a judge of the competition, we judge (the teams) based on the required set of moves and turns' made correctly and safely. Safety is our biggest priority," Davidson said. "This is one of the larger turnouts we've had, more than 120 jumpers."

The events included the four-way intermediate formation skydiving, eight-way speed formation, and classic accuracy landing.

All of which must be done under the U.S. Parachuting Association guidelines.

For many of the jumpers not competing in the meet, it was an opportunity to receive one-on-one training with coaches.

"(During this event) my friends coached me, I even got to jump yesterday," said Spc. Tommy Young, 11th Quartermaster Company, 82nd Airborne Division. "It was a good experience because not only do I get to jump, I'm also learning to become a better jumper."

Though Saturday was a bit rough many of the competitors had a great jumping experience as they took part in the four-way competition, but Sunday the winds were too strong for even the most experienced jumper.

"The weather is so unpredictable and today it's really rough," said Cadet Jill Hoops, a senior at The U.S. Military Academy at West Point, who took the gold medal in the accuracy category after landing .23 centimeters within the target. "Even though yesterday was a bit windy ... I wouldn't dare jump in today's weather."

The winds were strong and it didn't take long after they slowed down for them to pick up again. The competition came to a stand still while the jumpers waited for the winds to die down.

"I've been coming out (here to compete) since my sophomore year," she said. "But now we're heading to the collegiate competition in Florida."

With 113 lifts, more than 1,795 jumps by 183 registered jumpers with no malfunctions and no injuries, the Black and Gold Competition meet results were as follow:
